Q3 commentary 2024

The global equity market hit an all-time-high again in the third quarter but also witnessed large volatility in different corners of the world. The Japanese market in particular acted like a giant yo-yo as the popular carry-trade against US tech suddenly lost its popularity. In a similar vein, the hype around artificial intelligence cooled as the market began to focus more on the financial return of the huge investments that have been announced year-to-date in this area. This topic will likely garner more attention in the coming months. In the general economy, higher price levels caused by the bout of inflation in recent years are beginning to bite. Consumers remain somewhat constrained in many geographies although employment numbers still look decent. Reported inflation figures continue to moderate in most geographies and interest rates are coming down. While geopolitical tension builds, the stock market continues to grind higher.

SKAGEN Global underperformed its benchmark index MSCI AC World in the third quarter. Some of the fund's largest positions treaded water and accumulated intrinsic value that we expect will be crystallized later and thus reflected in significantly higher stock prices in due course. The fund's three best performers in the period measured by absolute return contribution were DSV, Brown & Brown and Intercontinental Exchange (ICE). The Danish freight-forwarder acquired the German competitor Schenker, a move that has been in the making for some time. The transaction can add substantial value to the DSV share price if Schenker is skilfully integrated into the DSV corporate machine, a process that we foresee will take two to three years. Our US holdings in Brown & Brown and ICE performed well and delivered reports in-line with our investment hypotheses. Interestingly, with mortgage rates now beginning to tick down, ICE is coming closer to reaping the potentially huge benefits of its mortgage technology division that has been assembled piece-by-piece over the past few years. The fund's three largest detractors in absolute terms were Dollar General, Edwards Lifesciences and ASML. The Dutch chip-equipment maker ASML pulled back as the market rotated away from the chip industry and artificial intelligence theme. Dollar General and Edwards Lifesciences provided disappointing quarterly figures, and we sold out of both positions as further detailed below.

SKAGEN Global initiated four new positions and exited four positions during the third quarter. The following companies joined the fund: Waste Connections, Brunello Cucinelli, Munich Re and Stora Enso. We sold out of Waste Management, LVMH, Edwards Lifesciences and Dollar General. Our long-term view on the US waste sector remains positive. Waste Management is the largest player and has more than doubled its market cap since we first invested in the stock in 2018. The stock has been a solid relative outperformer and delivered high absolute returns. The company has grown its core business both organically and inorganically during this time. However, given its dominant domestic position in the waste collection and landfill space, Waste Management has attracted the eyes of regulators and now likely faces restrictions in terms of expanding the core bread-and-butter business through further acquisitions. To that point, we interpret its decision to buy the medical waste and professional services company Stericycle as a step away from its core business into an adjacent avenue to seek growth opportunities. We have therefore sold Waste Management and entered Waste Connections that is a smaller firm – but still the third largest in the country – with a long runway ahead focused on precisely garbage collection and landfill operations. The global luxury industry is another sector where we see tremendous opportunity for value creation over the next decade. Humans have long been attracted to luxury goods and this trend is unlikely to go out of fashion anytime soon. This does not mean that everything in the sector offers a good investment opportunity. On the contrary, we argue that stock-picking will remain key here. We sold most of our stake in the French luxury behemoth LVMH in the summer as our due diligence indicated strained consumer sentiment in the critical Chinese market. More recent data points have confirmed that the Chinese consumer indeed remains in the doldrums. With a market cap of more than €300 billion and annual revenues clocking in north of €80 billion, LVMH's customer base has widened markedly in recent years and growth will not be as easy to come by at this scale unless the aspiring consumer is fairing well. Hence, we exited LVMH and re-allocated some of the capital to the less well-known ultra-high-end luxury player Brunello Cucinelli. Named after its founder, Brunello Cucinelli is a mid-cap company (c. €5+ billion market cap) that hails from the hamlet of Solomeo, a village in Italy's cashmere valley not far from Perugia. The company operates according to its “humanistic capitalism” principle that prescribes profit sharing with all stakeholders and making some donations to charity. This approach has served the company well historically, but also held back margins compared to industry peers. We believe this margin gap will narrow in coming years as annual sales will ramp up from the current €1 billion mark. Another plus is that Brunello Cucinelli is not particularly reliant on sales in the Chinese market. We also re-engaged with the German reinsurance giant Munich Re. The company has skilfully navigated the inflationary environment, and we still see a compelling story around underappreciated capital returns combined with improved underwriting backed by a solid balance sheet. The fund also initiated a position in the Nordic paper, forest and packaging company Stora Enso. This stock is currently out of favour with the investment community, but things are changing in the company. A new Chairman has re-vitalized the executive management team with fresh talent and instilled a shareholder value mantra across the group. This mindset has been lacking for a while and there is certainly room for the company to surprise on the upside.

The medical device company Edwards Lifesciences left the portfolio after a disappointing quarter when the company lowered guidance but was unable to convincingly explain the underlying reasons. We believe the risk-reward potential is now tilted to the downside. The US discount chain Dollar General also delivered quarterly numbers below expectations. It is becoming increasingly apparent that the giants in the US retail sector are gradually taking market share at the expense of most other retail operators. The turnaround path for Dollar General looks challenging and we decided to exit the position.
